

I FERIA DEL Libro

"I see. You have no interest in seeing your own mother and seeing only the dog."
 "No, I just thought he'd be with you, that's all."
 "Well he's not. Your friend Cerise's taken him for a walk, that's where he is. Come for a nice morning run down by the canal."
 "Cerise?"
 "Yes, she said that the heard dog that Piero needed it was there, and then to shake them up. And of course though I have been due to keep myself reasonably trim, I'm not really able to do anything like that for Piero any more, so Cerise offered. Rita was astonished. Cerise didn't run, the barely walked these days, living in much discomfort of her drunken husband. Rita's mother had been interested in the conversation. 'Anyway I only came in because I was pointing to the Ammie that it's seven o'clock tonight!'"
 "What is?"
 "They're coming down to St Rita's with me this evening, Annie and her friend Kitty. We're teaching King's bridge."
 Rita's mind was churning. But that will be during supper.
 "I suppose they manage to think that some things are more important because they're nice and normal and they usually like people," said Rita's mother. She sat at her daughter's table waiting for coffee to be served to her, her face thunderous with the heavy implication that Rita was neither nice nor normal and probably hated meeting people.
 The washing machine had just begun to swirl and hum when Rosemary rang. "Oh Lord, Rita, how I envy you, relaxed in your own home while I'm stuck at work."
 "That's the way things are. Rita knew there was an edge to her voice. She was becoming sharp with people for so reason. She rushed on to take the harm out of her words. "We all think the grass is greener in the other place. Often when I'm picking up things from the floor here I envy you being at it and out of the house all day."
 "No, of course you don't."
 "Why do you say that?"
